Overview

Introduction: The CEDP Project and the GEPON 2 Germany Survey

Leslie Tkach-Kawasaki, University of Tsukuba, Japan

The Global Environmental Policy Network Survey 2 (Germany), also referred to as G-GEPON 2, is part of the results of the Comparative Energy Discourse Project (CEDP) (AAD26048), a three-year project funded by the JSPS (Japan Society for the Promotion of Science) Topic-Setting Program to Advance Cutting Edge Humanities and Social Sciences Research (Area Cultivation) from October 1, 2014 to September 30, 2017.

This introduction briefly outlines the CEDP project and role played by the G-GEPON 2 Survey (2016-17) in realizing the aims of the project. In a broad sense, the background and aims of the CEDP involve investigation of the nature of energy policy, examining how energy policy is discussed in different media format, and seeking to reveal policy relationships through cross-national comparisons.

In more detail, our first broad aim – to investigate the nature of energy policy – involves looking at such policies from three different levels, namely, the political, actor, and media levels. At the political level, policies are made on multiple levels such as international (cross-border), national, and local levels. For the purposes of our project, we are focusing on the national levels involving German and Japanese energy policy. At the actor level, legislative (government), corporate, and civil society actors play important roles in energy policy. In particular, in terms of the G-GEPON 2 Survey (the results of which are reported within), we believe that surveying these three actor sets in the German national energy policy environment may yield significant results as to their roles, attitudes, and relationship networks. Finally, at the media level, our project seeks to assess how energy policy is discussed in different media formats such as traditional mass media (newspapers) as well as Internet-based media, including social media channels.

The second broad aim of the project – examining how energy policy is discussed in different media formats – seeks to compare the discourse in offline and online media. Our methodologies in this area involve text mining, content analysis, surveys, and network analysis. We believe that a combination of these methodologies, analyzed individually as well as comparative, will not only yield valuable information concerning the overall policy process and actor relationships, but also contribute from an academic perspective to developing paradigms for mixed methodological research.

The third broad aim of the project involves the characterization of policy relationships in different countries. Through cross-national comparisons, we aim to develop a model of policy relationships in Germany that can be compared to that of Japan. For this purpose, the G-GEPON 2 Survey is a key methodological process by which we can compare actors, actor relationships, attitudes, and contact among government, corporate, civil society, and mass media actors in the German energy policy sector. In order to realize our aim of developing a cross-national model, the results from the G-GEPON 2 Survey will be compared to those from the J-GEPON 2 Survey (2012-13).

To summarize our overall objectives, Figure 1 shows the broad conceptualization of our research plan. Our conception of the policy process involves examining the discourse, attitudes, relationships, and evaluation of overall policy processes. Such factors within these processes are then communicated to the public through what we call the “media prism,” which involves (traditional) mass media channels, government and legislative processes, and how policies are discussed in online media format. Finally, the third pane of Figure 1 lists the methodological tools that we use to reveal relationships and discourse through text mining, content analysis, surveys, and network analysis.

Background to the GEPON Survey Series

The GEPON surveys were originally devised by Professor Yutaka Tsujinaka, University of Tsukuba, Japan. Initially designed to be cross-national comparative surveys, the first set of surveys were conducted in four countries: Japan (1997), the United States (October 1998 to November 1999), South Korea (April to July 1998), and Germany (July to October 2000).

Since the collection of the first set of cross-national data, significant advances in international environmental policy have occurred. Changes in the actor landscape and progressive climate change have posed risks to natural and human environments, prompting political and social debates. Consequently, in 2012-13, an updated version of the survey, with some question content reflecting policy-related events in Japan immediately prior to and following the March 2011 Great East Japan Earthquake, was undertaken in Japan, also by Professor Tsujinaka.

In the aftermath of Japan’s “triple disaster,” world attention was focused not only on Japan and its response, but also ignited debate in various national and international milieu concerning energy policy, specifically in terms of nuclear and renewable energy policies. While these topics have been the center of attention in Japan’s energy policy for a number of years, the incident at the Fukushima Dai’ichi nuclear plant and the subsequent political and policy shifts suggested that further investigation was necessary to assess shifts in policies, how policies were discussed in various media channels, and actor relationships. On a broader international scale, after “Fukushima” in Japan, nuclear energy policy became a major topic in many countries in the world, including the United States, France, and Germany. Within six months of the Fukushima incident, the German government passed legislation to phase out nuclear energy. This and other major events in Germany since 2011 prompted our research team to conduct a new round of the GEPON survey in Germany in 2016-17.

General content of questions

The G-GEPON 2 survey questions cover four main areas, as shown in Table 1.

Table 1 GEPON 2 Germany Survey Content

Question Content	Examples
Information Network	Information sources, important specialized information, and information exchange with other organisations
Support and cooperation network	Support and cooperation with other organisations, and lobbying target organisations or groups
Policy attitudes	Attitudes toward greenhouse-gas reduction goals and energy policy decisions
Organisational demographics	Foundation year, number of members or employees, budget, and relationship to the government

Source: GEPON surveys

In the section following this preface, Manuela Hartwig, Kensuke Nishimura, Barbara Petrulewicz, and Leslie Tkach-Kawasaki describe the preparations for the survey, including translation and localization of the survey content, the identification of target population, and the protocol for conducting the interviews.

Response Rate

Table 2 shows the target number of organizations and the response rate for undertaking the G-GEPON 2 survey. The survey was undertaken from November 1, 2016 and was finished on February 28, 2017.

Acknowledgements

We would like to acknowledge the following organizations and people for their support and involvement in our project.

We received generous funding from the Japan Society for the Promotion of Science, Topic-Setting Program to Advance Cutting Edge Humanities and Social Sciences Research (Area Cultivation), and we are very grateful for their support during our project term. We would also like to thank the researchers involved in our project (refer to the project member list below) for their support and endeavors for the project.

Many people were involved in conducting the G-GEPON 2 Survey in Germany. Prof. Dr. Miranda Schreurs (Technical University of Munich) and Prof. Dr. Verena Blechinger-Talcott (Free University of Berlin), as our project's co-investigators, provided us with a great deal of assistance in terms of institutional support and the practical undertaking of the G-GEPON 2 survey. We are very grateful for their support and work on behalf of the project. The interview team in Berlin was led by Kensuke Nishimura, an expert and consultant on energy policy in Germany, and we truly appreciate his commitment and practical work in training, conducting, and assisting us with reporting the results of the survey. Mr. Nishimura's team of interviewers – Barbara Petrulewicz (Bonn University), Mara Gröner (ICH GmbH), and Robin Gössmann (Free University of Berlin), and Manuela Hartwig (University of Tsukuba) – provided us with their time and valuable insights gained while conducting the interviews, and we thank them deeply for their support of our project.

We would also like to thank other people associated with the University of Tsukuba who assisted us greatly in the preparations to conduct the survey as well as creating this code book. Three graduate students of the Graduate School of Humanities and Social Sciences – Kostiantyn Ovsianikov, Roksolana Lavrinenko, and Mukaddamkhon Akhmedova – helped us to update the original G-GEPON survey's actor list (Kostiantyn) as well as do the initial layout and formatting for this code book (Roksolana and Mukaddamkhon). Hikaru Hasegawa (undergraduate student) assisted us briefly in collecting social media data. Yumi Kinoshita also briefly worked with our Tsukuba team in preparation for our first project symposium on September 6, 2016. Finally, Associate Professor Jae-Young Choe gave a great deal of advice to us regarding the layout and formatting of this codebook.

Finally, I am very appreciative for the work of the following three three co-investigators who physically assisted in the preparation of this code book. Co-investigator Junku Lee (who is also the research associate for our project) spent a great deal of time preparing the tables and doing the layout for the code book. Co-investigator Manuela Hartwig, along with the German research team, contributed a description of the interview methodology used in the G-GEPON 2 survey. Finally, I would like to thank Professor Yutaka Tsujinaka, who created the original GEPON survey, for encouraging us with this project, as well as his advice and suggestions concerning this code book.

Methodological Approaches to Cross-national Surveys

Manuela Hartwig, Kensuke Nishimura, Barbara Petrulewicz, and Leslie Tkach-Kawasaki

Introduction

The second GEPON survey conducted in Japan (2012-13) served as the base for the second round of the German GEPON survey. Through the process of localization – adapting the Japanese survey questions to fit the German linguistic, social, and political contexts – the survey questions, structure, and design were modified. In this section, we discuss the steps involved in localizing the original J-GEPON 2 survey for the German context

Localization

As explained above, the GEPON survey was designed originally for the social and political context of Japan. Thus, adapting the survey content and format to administer it in Germany posed certain challenges. In this section, we share some insights about the localization process, which is not sufficiently addressed in academic publishing. By detailing the method, our aim is to highlight localization issues and resolutions to assist young researchers who may be considering cross-national surveys as part of their methodology in the political and social sciences. We hope to shed some light on practices of cross-national surveys and hence contribute to methodological considerations for similar undertakings.

In order to conduct the GEPON survey in Germany, it was necessary to adapt the original survey to the non-Japanese context. The adaptation process involved the following steps: 1) translation, 2) contextualization, and 3) questionnaire structure and design modifications. Each step is described in more detail below.

Translation

As energy-, environment-, and climate-change-related research deals with topics that may transcend national borders, as one methodological means, cross-national surveys can shed light on national and cross-border environmental and energy policies. Yet while there is a great deal of academic literature about research methodology in general and how to conduct surveys in particular, the process of survey translation is not addressed fully.

In order for a survey to fulfill its purpose as a methodological means to resolve research questions and gather useful and truthful responses from respondents, a survey instrument should be designed that fits into the corresponding cultural and social context. This context may be bounded by national and/or linguistic borders and, as such, understanding and then translating the survey content is a key initial step in adapting a survey to a new target population.

This poses two main challenges. First, from a conceptual perspective, we must be aware of the target society's culture and linguistic patterns by identifying possible differences in communication and interaction. Consideration of this point in survey design is essential to ensure cultural and conceptual equivalence and produce valuable results for analyses and comparison. Second, as a practical approach, we must ensure comparability in terms of questions, format, and desired responses. As part of the survey instrument, the questions should be comparable in cross-national contexts, striking a delicate balance between being faithful to the original meanings yet communicating that meaning in a different linguistic and social context. Care should be taken to ensure that the survey format, including question order and flow within the survey, be optimized in a way that fits the target context as well.

In the initial step of localizing the J-GEPON 2 survey, all questions in the original Japanese version were reviewed with the goal of selecting questions that addressed universal themes or could be adapted readily to the German context. As a result, not all questions from J-GEPON 2 survey were included in the final version of the G-GEPON 2 survey. For example, questions within the J-GEPON 2 survey that inquired specifically about Japan's political context – including those that mentioned Japan-specific policies, legislation, and political actors – were not translated directly into German. Instead, new questions reflecting similar events in Germany's political context were devised.

One feature of the GEPON surveys is a set of questions concerning each organization's response to a set of events. In the first wave of GEPON surveys in the late 1990s and early 2000s, this question set, originally devised for the Japanese context, was re-configured for and adapted to the American, South Korean, and German contexts. In a similar manner, the event list from the J-GEPON 2 survey was modified to fit the German context for the G-GEPON 2 survey.

Contextualization

Table 1 shows the dates and short descriptions of the events that were considered to be major events in the German renewable energy sector in the period 2010-2015. The time period was chosen for the following reasons. First, considering the time difference between the time frame we aimed to cover with the survey and the actual time of conducting the survey, we chose September 2010 as the earliest possible date to account for the possibility that the interviewees may have difficulties in providing responses to questions with regards to a historical context more than six years. Second, upon consultation with experts in the energy policy sector in Germany, the date was deemed appropriate in terms of policy activities in the early 2000s and 2010s. Finally, we chose a date range that would incorporate “pre-Fukushima” and “post-Fukushima” time frames in Germany. In the J-GEPON 2 survey conducted in 2012-13, “Fukushima” – a singular phrase referring to the triple disasters that occurred on March 11, 2011 of earthquake, tsunami, and subsequent damage to the Fukushima Dai'ichi nuclear power plant – is considered to be a watershed event in Japan. Thus, this range was chosen in order to assess whether “Fukushima” had an impact on subsequent energy policy decisions taken by other countries and be able to compare the German organizational attitudes towards key events with the data gained from a corresponding question in the J-GEPON 2 survey conducted in 2012-13 in Japan. Each event's time frame and reason for selection are briefly described in the following paragraphs.

Table 1 G-GEAPON 2 Event List

Event Date / Time Period	Event
September 28, 2010	“Energy Concept” by the Bundestag (Energiekonzept der Bundesregierung)
June 30/July 1, 2011	Nuclear Phase-Out (Atomausstieg)
June 30/July 1, 2011	Energy Transition (Energiewende)
November – December 2011	COP17
February – November 2013	Renewable Energy Act reform discussions (Erneuerbare Energiengesetz: Reformdiskussion)
July 2014	Renewable Energy Act amendment
November – December 2015	COP21

The first event is the publication of the “Energy Concept” paper by the Bundestag (Energiekonzept der Bundesregierung) on September 28, 2010. This publication outlined the general development and implementation strategies to achieve the goal of gradually replacing conventional energy technologies with renewable energy by 2050 and introduced greenhouse-gas emission reduction targets.

The second and third events occurred on June 30-July 1, 2011 and involve the passage of nuclear phase-out and energy transition legislation, respectively, in the Bundestag. With heightened global debate about the merits and demerits of nuclear energy as an energy source in the aftermath of the Fukushima Dai’ichi nuclear plant accident during the Great East Japan Earthquake on March 11, 2011, these two pieces of complementary legislation were considered to be watershed events in the energy policy sector in Germany. Nuclear phase-out (Atomausstieg) refers to legislation phasing out all remaining nuclear power plants in Germany by 2022. The energy transition legislation (Energiewende) passed at this time featured amendments to Germany’s landmark 2001 Renewable Energy Act which strengthened the promotion of renewable energy technologies and set high targets for incorporating renewable energy sources by 2040.

The fourth event is the COP17 conference on November 28-December 11, 2011, in Durban, South Africa. The “Durban-Round” was not successful to establish a new treaty to limit greenhouse gas emissions among the Parties of the Conference (UN member states). However, the German government committed itself to the management framework of the Green Climate Fund which had been adopted at COP17.

The fifth event covers the reform discussions of the Renewable Energy Act between February and November 2013. The former minister for the environment, Peter Altmeier, proposed changes to deal with the increase in cost of promoting renewable energy technologies for consumers, which were modified and integrated into the coalition contract in November 2013 of the newly government newly elected in September 2013.

The sixth event identified is the actual passing of major amendments to the Renewable Energy Act in June 2014, based on the reform discussions and ensuing agreements made by the government with coalition members in after rounds of discussion during 2013 (referring to the fifth event).

The final and most recent event the survey asked the organisations covers the Paris agreement of COP21, held from November 30 to December 12, 2015. The parties to the conference agreed on a new treaty to succeed the Kyoto Protocol to implement global measures in reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

These events were chosen carefully to provide the G-GEPON 2 survey with context which is both specific enough yet broad enough to leave room for qualitative discussions during the interviews.

In summary, it is important to note that the political landscape and government party structure in Japan changed after “Fukushima.” While this is clearly apparent in the Japanese context, it is more challenging to discern whether the incident had an impact on re-thinking and re-configuring energy policy in other countries. In order to assess this, the second wave of the GEPON survey conducted in Japan included many issue- and environmental-policy-related questions. Equivalent national events in the energy sector in Germany were selected to gain organizations’ opinions of major events in Germany as well as provide a basis for comparing the two sets of events on a cross-national basis. Despite the impression that the Fukushima incident and its political and policy aftermath influenced international opinion about renewable energy in general (and nuclear energy in particular), we sought to choose issues for the G-GEPON 2 survey that would be unbiased yet revealing of the nature of Germany’s renewal energy political landscape and its discourse.

Questionnaire structure and design modifications

After finalizing the content of the survey, structural and formatting modifications were made to streamline the interview process overall. As one step in this procedure, certain questions from the J-GEPON 2 survey were not included in the G-GEPON 2 survey. The J-GEPON 2 survey had a total of 43 questions (11 pages, including instructions for the interviewers), however, the G-GEPON 2 has a total of 30 questions (13 pages). In addition to the main survey instrument, a Supplementary Questionnaire comprised of seven questions, which included questions concerning organisational demographics and relationship with the government, was also prepared for the G-GEPON 2 survey.

Owing to the length of the survey instrument, certain modifications were necessary in order to facilitate the interview process. Test interviews revealed that the average interview time exceeded one hour and some questions required more time for respondents to answer. Considering potential time constraints of organization executives, our team accounted for the possibility that some interview sessions could be limited or even cancelled.

Thus, in order to obtain as many completed surveys as possible, our interview team created a list of primary questions that were prioritized for comparisons with the J-GEPON 2 survey and focus on the main network- and relationship-oriented questions. Furthermore, the Supplementary Questionnaire was handed to the respondent after the main interview with the request to return a completed copy via post or email. As result of these design and procedural modifications, almost all interviews were completed within one hour. Table 2 Survey Structure Differences: J-GEPON 2 and G-GEPON 2) summarizes the differences of the questionnaire structures. (For further details, please see the G-GEPON 2 survey in the appendix.)

Target population selection

The target list for the G-GEPON 2 survey was constructed in the following manner. The first-wave G-GEPON survey from 2000 provided a basic list of actors. However, owing to the fact that organizations go through amalgamations, changes in name, status, or location, and other events that may alter their structure, our first step was update this original list. We removed non-existing organizations, updated name changes, and removed organisations that merged with or split from other organisations. Our research team decided to use the original list as the main target population after the cleaning process in order to be able to add a longitudinal dimension to the survey through comparisons with G-GEPON 1.

Certain additions were made to the master organizational list used for the G-GEPON 2 survey. Mass media organisations, which were not part of the original G-GEPON 1 survey, were added to the list. Although the actor-identification process in the first-wave G-GEPON survey suggested that mass media channels (such as newspapers) played a very minor role in Germany’s policy networks, these organizations were added to the G-GEPON 2 actor list. As one of the main goals of the CEDP project overall was to examine the media dimension (which we call the “media prism”), we sought interview data from mass media channels. Furthermore, given advances in ICTs (information and communication technologies) through the Internet and the rise of social media use in the past two decades, we wanted to assess the relationship between such expanded media channels and potential policy networks. One identified organization ceased to exist during the time period for the interviews.

After the process of updating the list and adding new mass-media channels, the resulting list was comprised of 183 organizations. Our research team then reviewed each organization on the list in terms of fulfilling at least one of the following three criteria: (1) the organization participated in the first-wave G-GEAPON survey conducted in 2000; (2) the organization was identified by two experts on our research team (experts in the German energy sector) as being a key actor; and (3) the organization was identified as a participant in Germany's domestic environment and energy consultation process and/or in one or more COP sessions. Although we identified 17 out of 183 organizations at the European Union (EU) level that fulfilled at least one of the three criteria, we limited our potential interview list to mainly domestic organizations within Germany.

The interview team based in Germany was provided with a master target organization list and the survey instrument. In consultation with the survey manager, they identified potential respondents in each organization who would be in a position to be able to provide full responses to the survey instrument and would be knowledgeable of pre- and post-Fukushima events. Our survey team made initial contact with each potential organizational respondent to inquire as to their cooperation with our survey. During this initial contact, our interview team confirmed that the potential respondent was able to answer the survey and, in certain cases, the initial organizational respondent re-directed our inquiries to a different respondent in the same organization.

During this initial contact (mainly by telephone), a member of the survey team briefly explained our project (including information about its academic and cross-national nature) and explained the purpose of the survey. With regards to the survey instrument itself, the interview team provided details about the length of the survey and, in some cases, explanations about certain questions, such as those concerning network analysis. Upon requesting and setting up interview times, the interview team explained that approximately one hour was necessary to complete the survey.

The interviewees tended to give lengthy answers at the beginning of the interview, but shorter ones towards the end. Generally, it can be noted that in face-to-face interviews the interviewees spend more time to think about and discuss their answers for each question, and told related stories or anecdotes. Thus, the longest interviews had been conducted in person. The average length of face-to-face interviews are approximately one and a half hours. The longest interview took about three hours of which the interviewee was a representative of a NGO. The interview situation was a mix of quantitative survey and qualitative interviews for the interviewees were given room to provide more in-depth answers exceeding the closed questions of the survey and transcriptions of the recorded interviews provide an additional set of data for qualitative analyses.

Time Frame

The first interviews were conducted in early November 2016, and the final interview was conducted at the end of February 2017.
